COMEDIENNE AND OPERA SINGER.

Miss Maude Adams, Who Has Made the "Hit of Her Life" with John Drew in "The Masked Ball," and Dainty Della Fox, the Soubrette, at Home.

HERE are two actresses in New York city who are just now occupy-ing a large portion of the attention of the theatrical public-which means pretty much everybody. One of them is Mande Adams, John Draw's frail looking little leading lady, and the other is Della Fox, the piquant little look who have the second of the piquant little leading lady, and the second of the look who have the second of the look who have the second of the latest latest piquant little body who hassung and danced herself into the affections of hundreds of thousands of persons in the United States.

I called at Miss Adams' rooms a few days are the control of the average of the control of the control

I called at Miss Adams' rooms a few days ago and sent my card up with the expectation that I would be received in a condescending manner by the girl—for she is still a girl—about whom all New York is talking. When a young person has made an emphatic hit, especially in New York city, a severe attack of "enlarged cranium" is almost certain to develop rapidly. This is the usual course, and I expected to find Miss Adams no exception to the rule. But she was,

But she was, She was a conspicuous exception, for not She was a conspieuous exception, for not only was she not impressed with a sense of her own greatness, but she actually seemed to be embarrassed by the idea of an interview. Miss Adams came into the drawing room dressed in an ordinary house gown of a simple and almost severe pattern. I took occasion, having observed this, to ask if she is fond of dress. I nearly fainted when she told me that she abhors dresses and wishes that they had never been invented; they are a missance, etc. Of course the proper, or rather the professional, answer for an actress to have made would have been an emphatic declaration that have been an emphatic declaration that she adored dress, and that Worth, Felix and half a dozen more of their kind were and nair a dozen more of their kind were all making robes for her which would "surpass anything ever seen on the Amer-ican stage." But Miss Adams isn't that kind of a girl. Her manner impresses one immediately with the thorough sincerity of her nature and her aversion to every-thing savoring of humbug. She is gen-uineness itself. uineness itself.

Miss Adams says that she is not "a great student," like most actresses. She has a fad for accumulating old books, but not the extra expensive ones. She plays the piano, but is just now devoting her spare time to busing the large philate.

but is just now devoting her spare time to learning to twang the harp, which she considers the sweetest instrument ever invented. She is progressing rapidly and already performs quite creditably.

I have heard several persons who have seen Maude Adams in "The Masked Ball" express astonishment that a girl with such anquestioned ability had not made a hit sooner. The reason is very plain. She had never before had a part which admitted of the possibility of brilliant work. As soon the possibility of brilliant work. As soon as she was afforded the opportunity she showed what she could do.

Miss Adams was born in Salt Lake City in—well, long after the Grant-Seymour campaign. Her first appearance was made when she was less than a very old. She when she was less than a year old. She was carried on the stage on a waiter, the baby who should have "played the part" having taken it into her head to indulge in an operatic selection at the critical mo-ment. Miss Adams' first speaking part was in "The Celebrated Case," in San was in "The Celebrated Case," in San Francisco, when she was about six years old. Her mother is an actress, and in fact plays the part of her maternal ancestor in "The Masked Ball." When she was old enough Miss Adams got an engagement with Charles Frohman and then with Sothern. She returned to Frohman and last year played the cripple girl in "The Lost Paradise."

When the company was organized for

When the company was organized for "The Masked Ball" it was decided to let Miss Adams try the role of the young wife, who is required to simulate intoxication in one scene. She studied the character, and has received just as much commendation as Mr. Drew ms indeed she should for and has received just as intent commenta-tion as Mr. Drew, as indeed she should, for her part is the more difficult of the two. Miss Adams does not speak of her previous numerous triumphs. On the contrary, she says she has never had any. Everybody likes to record the success of a dutiful and affectionate daughter, who, deprived by death of the guiding hand of a father, has struggled along in a difficult profession, side by side with a devoted mother, toward the clusive goal of fame without once deviating from the line of duty to parent or profession. Thus has Maude Adams done, and therefore her success is deserved.

When the "Pinafore" craze was at its height there lived in St. Louis, as there does will a shetter.

mite by Miss Nellie Page for an amateur performance of Gilbert and Sullivan's then popular operetta. From that day Della Fox has loved the stage, and the people who pay to see what occurs behind the footlights seem to love her, for there is probably not a more popular soubrette on the American stage than she. Although this young woman is barely out of her teens she receives a larger salary than the governor of almost any state in the Union.

Della Fox—that is her real name—played her first speaking part in "The Celebrated Case," with James O'Neill, just as Miss Adams did, but her career really began seriously when she became the soubrette of Conried's Opera company. Her quaint and original methods had attracted some attention, and when Ben Stevens was about to take De Wolf Hopper a-starring a little more than two years ago he went to Trenton, where Conried's company was playing, to see whether Miss Fox would suit. He thought she would, and engaged her on the spot. She has been with him ever since, and will probably remain where she is for many years, as she says the starring bee has not yet got into her bounet and bee has not yet got into her bonnet and shall not.

shall not.
Sensible girl.
Miss Fox made her first great hit in "Castles in the Air," about the worst apology for a comic opera ever seen in New York. She emphasized her ability by her work in "Wang," and has given evidence of versatility by her performance of Hilaria in "The Lady or the Tiger."
I saw Miss Fox in her handsome suite of rooms at the Hotel Vendome. She can sit at her window and look directly across the street into the Broadway theater. She says she likes to be near her work. The daily street into the Broadway theater. She says she likes to be near her work. The daily routine of this interesting actress and singer is as follows: Breakfast about 10, read the papers and mail and answer correspondence, shopping and calling, back to the hotel, lunch, a long walk or a drive, dinner, read evening papers, go to the theater, whence she returns at about 11 o'clock, then a light lunch and—bed.

Miss Fox is not a thorough musician. She plays the piano a little by ear. She is fond of reading novels and newspapers. She dotes on nice dresses, but abhors anything flashy, as I could see by the rich but plain wrapper in which she received me. Both of Miss Fox's parents are living in St. Louis, but her father has retired, and has turned his photographing business for some years, but has abandoned it, and now devotes all of her time and attention to De Wolf Hopper's soubrette, whom she compels to keep the roses in her cheeks by long constitutional walksdaily. She thinks that is the best medicine an actress can possibly take. Miss Fox has been interriewed a great many times, but she is still but a girl and possesses all the naivete and frankness of a child. She has become stouter and more charming, if possible, during the last two years. She likes the stage, does not think the work laborious and proposes to stick to it anyway. LUCY LAWN.

in a topical song with many mod-ern stanzas he is so much less bad HOPPER AS PAUSANIUS, in this respect that he may be forgiven.

The libretto of "The Lady or the Tiger" is really humorous. The dialogue is bright —every line of it—and the fun is not produced by artificial incubating processes.
Its spontaneity is its greatest charm. The lyrics are pretty, and the music, which is lynes are pretty, and she maste, which is said to have been composed by a novice, possesses the sympathetic quality in a marked degree. The choruses are ambi-tious in the effects sought after, although a hypercritical person might profess to de-tect a sameness in the methods employed. Of course no one expects Mr. Hopper to do legitimate comedy work now. Clown-do legitimate comedy work now. Clowning has got to be second nature with him, but he goes through fewer of his ridiculous wobblings and cavortings in "The Lady or the Tiger" than in either of the other operas in which he has been seen as a star, and for that partial reformation he is to be commended. Jefferson de Angelis, as Menander, an underpaid prophet, who predicts pleasant things according to order, surprised me by his particular artistic work, while sweet, charming little Della Fox showed that she can make her ability as a sou-brette recognized even in a part which is not "fat." The rest of the cast was fully up to the requirements of the opera, and as the mounting was particularly elab-

It is not easy to get five bedrooms and a bathroom over four rooms on the ground floor. Yet there is a demand for them. Five floor. Yet there is a demand for them. Five bedrooms come very near being a necessity in a growing family. First, there is a family bedroom, then one room for the boys, another one for the girls, a guestroom, servant's room and bath. The natural requirements of the first floor are four rooms—sitting room, parlor, dining room and kitchen. Of course one occasionally meets the demand for a double parlor, library, smoking room, breakfast room, in addition to the regular dining room, and sometimes to the regular dining room, and sometimes a laundry. It frequently happens that in a house with a library, smoking room, breakfast room and two parlors the entire space is reserved for social uses, and that after all the family lives on the second floor. The dining room is not the family dining room for general use. It is reserved for social occasions.

The plan which is here given is a comfortable, economical house. It is economical in the matter of cost, expense of furnishing and labor in caring for it. There is no waste or useless space. On the ground floor there is sufficient room to meet the requirements of comfortable living and at the same time any ordinary social requirements. There are a large parlor and reconternal to the same time are a large parlor and reconternal table. the same time any ordinary social requirements. There are a large parlor and reception hall, which may be thrown together, and an ample dining room back of the reception hall. There is a kitchen which is conveniently arranged to serve under ordinary or social conditions of living. The second floor is connected with the first floor between the first floor by two stairways—one from the reception hall and one from the kitchen. The kitchen stairway connects with a short hall in the rear, which has direct connec-tion with the servant's room. This hall and the room named may be cut off from the front hall by means of a door. The four rooms in front of the rear hall are entirely reserved for the family. Connecting with them is the bathroom, which is placed directly over the kitchen, and is thus economically disposed of as concerns the arrangement of the plumbing apparatus. From the bathroom one goes to the attic. Next to the attic stairway is a closet which may be used for bathroom linen and other purposes. Near the bathroom door which may be used for bathroom linen and other purposes. Near the bathroom door is a general linen closet. Each of the bed-rooms is provided with ample closet ac-commodations.

The house is square in front, with round corners, which are arranged to give a pic-tures and actually. The projection of the turesque exterior. The projection of the bedroom on the right, over the dining-room wall, gives additional space at the same time that it adds interest to the ex-terior. A large dormer window, as shown in front, would serve in case of necessity to light a large square room in this part of the attic. In case one wanted more sitting space in connection with the porch, a balcony could be extended from the porch proper around to the side of the house.
